A remarkable instance of the desire of power for its own sake, and for the purpose of oppression is found in Governor Brownlow, of Tennessee. He has won for himself a degree of notoriety which is by no means enviable, and is still laboring to make for himself a name which, if it descends to future generations, will pass like that of Erastostratus associated with infamy. While the name of the one nurvives as the destroyer only of a heathen temple, the other may be transmitted to posterity as one who sought, by every art which cuming could devise, to destroy the liberties of a people over whom he has been forced by the power of the bayonet.
